CALP SKINS REACH THEIR LOWEST

OFFICE OF PITTSBURG DISPATCH. SATURDAY, September 7, 1889. Country Produce.

The marked features of trade in produce lines for the week were the upward drift of peaches and eggs. Last week we had a east of peaches, this week there has been a famine. The Western Pennsylvania and Eastern Ohio crop this season is practically a failure. The sections that are famed with a good crop, such as Delaware and Southern Ohio, have enough to do to supply demand nearer home. During most of the week there was a scarcity of peaches in this market, and fancy stock sold quickly at advanced rates. To-day supply is better, and markets

It is, however, an assured fact that we are not going to have the low prices which pre-vailed last season. The last opportunity for cheap peaches passed by a couple of weeks ago. Choice eggs are active at a range fully 2c per Choice eggs are active at a range fully 2c per dozen above that of last week. Ohio cheese has been advanced at headquarters during the week, but Pittsburg jobbers, true to their instincts and habita, hold on to old prices. A rise is almost sure to come in a few days. Choice grades of butter are quoted the same as a week ago, but the drift is plainly upward. Oranges and lemons have advanced and are firmly held at the advance. Choice stock is very firm a toutside quotations. Sweet potatoes, tomatoes, cantaloups and grapes are all tending toward lower prices, owing to liberal supplies.

Cereals. Cerenla.

Inspection of our domestic market column will disclose the fact that receipts of grain, hay and flour were unusually large for the week. The drift of prices is downward all along the cereal line. Corn prospects have greatly improved the past month and another two weeks without frost will put the crop out of danger and insure an average yield. As to wheat, cats and hay, the yield through Pittsburg's territory is equal to any past season in quantity and quality alike. Flour has declined fully 25c per barrel in the week past.

A leading jobber reports trade active, but at concessions to huyer, and collections very slow. The cash buyer has immensely the advantage these times of low prices and close margins. Jobbers like the sight of bank notes and the buyer who is ready to put down the stuff has the advantage every time. The advantage of having cash will furnish a fair profit to the buyer these times.

Hides Looking Up. will disclose the fact that receipts of grain, Hides Looking Up.

Prices are unchanged but firmer. The present is the best season of the year for trade, par-ticularly for heavy hides. Now tanners lay in ticularly for heavy hides. Now tanners lay in their heaviest supplies, for the reason that quality of hides from now till cold weather is at its best. Nature, which tempers the wind to the shorn lamb, also puts heavy hair on steers in cold weather. This heavy clothing accumulates dirt and adds weight to the hide, for which the tanner receives no equivalent. Hence the disposition to lay in large stocks at this season of the year.

Two large firms, of New York and Chicago, were represented by agents here this week, buying up calfskins. Supplies were far in excess of their wants. Out of over 20,000 cured calfskins in the hands of dealers here but 8,000 were purchased, and this at figures below anything for the past 30 or more years. The price paid for No. 1 calfskins weighing 7 to 12 pounds was 6c and from 12 to 15 pounds 53/6; No. 2 skins rated 2glower than these figures.

calfskins. Harness Leather. A representative of the largest harne ther tannery of Allegheny said to-day: "Our volume of trade for August was beyond that of any previous month. Orders came in that could not be accepted for want of goods. Though the capacity of Allegheny harness leather tanneries has been increased fully 25 leather tanneries has been increased thiny 20 per cent the past two years, stock was never more closely cleaned up at this time of the year. Prices have failed to advance and profits are very small. A month or two ago, however, there was practically no price for our goods, and it looked as if we would be forced to carry over a large amount of stock. Now markets are firm and the drift is upward." Wool Speculation.

In the past two weeks there has been a sufficient drop in wool to knock out speculators who were not very solid. A decline of 3c per pound is reported. The speculative spirit ran very high last month, and, in the language of one of our dealers, "people went crazy on wool," A drop of 3c per pound on the new pull in the past two weeks is apt to diminish the bank account of not a few who looked for wool to go the other direction.

GOOD FINANCIERING.

Consummation of One of the Biggest Deals Ever Undertaken Here - Millions of Money Involved.

One of the most important financial transctions that have ever taken place in Pittsburg has just been closed up, The H. C. Frick Coke Company having made the Fidelity Title and Trust Company its trustee to secure an issue of bonds to the amount of $2,500,000. Of this amount about $1,000,000 have already been placed in Pittsburg. The remainder of the loan, $1,-500,000, is for sale by the Fidelity company. The bonds bear 5 per cent interest and run

Heretofore it has been the custom in large deals of this kind to apply to Eastern trust companies. It is agreeable to note that this is no longer necessary, nor in any way this is no longer necessary, nor in any way excusable, as there are home institutions of sufficient standing to attend to any business of a financial nature, no matter how great the amount involved.

The success attending the placing of this large loan is quite a triumph for Pittsburg, showing, as it does, that she is fully competent to manage her own affairs without outside help, and, if need be, to lend a helping hand to her sister cities in time of need. It is to be hoped that this transaction will open the way to others of equal or even greater importance. Pittsburg is fortunate among cities. She is almost self-sustaining. Being a creditor, there is a steady stream of money flowing into her lap, to be used in the expansion of local business. What she has is her own, to do with it as she elects. This gives her standing in the financial world, and is a certain guarantee against reverses. A crash that would shake Pittsburg would leave very little standing of any other city in the Union.

And so, under highly favorable conditions, this hive of industry, this financial Gibraltar, is entering upon the fall and winter campaign under able generals and with a full commissariat. All of her great industries are keeping step to the music of improvement. Already far in advance of the business of last year, the remaining months of 1889 will show still greater expansion. All that is needed to meet the expectations of the most exuberant fancy is strict adherence to the enlightened, but, at the same time, conservative, policy, which has hither to been the guiding star of all her business ventures.

The scheme for changing moving day to May

The scheme for changing moving day to May

The scheme for changing moving day to May 1 is not dead by any means, but only sleeping. The committee in whose hands the matter resis has delayed action on account of the absence of a large number of property holders during the summer. As they are returning, the proposition will soon be put in shape for final action. That 's change is necessary from almost every that of view, and in the interest of the health and comfort of the large community of "fitters," and of no possible detriment to the landlords, is generally admitted, and that it will be adopted there is scarcely a doubt. Its popularity will carry it through.

Sales at the stock call Saturday morning were few and far between. Pipeage was the only thing dealt in, and only 50 shares of it changed hands. It brought 175—about the figure around which it has danced for some time.

THE SENATOR'S

BY A WASHINGTON AUTHOR [WRITTEN FOR THE DISPATCH.]

"She speaks English with the prettiest | circle of Madame Adam say that she is little French accent you ever heard, but really the most profound and brilliant woman of the time, but except to a few she told me her parents were Americans," said Mr. Frank Eberle, correspondent of the Metropolitan Courier. "Told you! You have met her then," ex-"Told you! You have met her then," ex-claimed young Caxton, of Caxtonia, a millionaire cotton planter by inheritance, of one of her instructors, to sing as no other vast accomplishments, in Washington training for a career in the Senate when one of the old Senators from his State should die or resign, if that time ever came. The two were conversing together in the drawing room of Secretary Hamilton on the of them?" occasion of a reception at which the President and his wife and all the high officials of the Government were present. Among other things young Caxton was looking out for as an aid to a brilliant public career was a wife whom he could esteem as the equal of himself in breeding and education; the most beautiful of her kind, irreproachable as purity itself, a fit partner in the temperate expenditure of his comfortable in-come. Caxton was old enough and had enough of flirtation to wear his early notions of love and romance somewhat threadbare, and his search for a wife partook very much of the business-like methods with which he studied public life and the machinery by which most successful politicians win success. As he stopped for a moment to chat with Eberle and watch the passing mob he had uttered an exclamation of astonishment when his eye caught the figure of a young woman leaning on the arm of ex-Senator

Drake, who had just returned from a long "She is the most beautiful creature I have ever seen," said Caxton with great enthusiasm. "Who can she be?"
"Yes, she is very beautiful. She is Mrs. Fardella, and that is about all I can tell you. She is the widow of an Italian of that name, a gentleman of great wealth who died two or three years ago, and left his vast estates to her, which include a big castle somewhere in the Maritime Alps, between Turin and Genoa. She passes her time visiting the capitals of the world apparently. and is now making a first call upon us in America. I met her in this way: Diemish, the Turkish decorator, was sent for to ar range the tapestries, portieres, rugs, crock-ery, pictures, and so on, which she brought to furnish her rooms, though it is said she is here only for the season. Knowing my own fancy for such work he invited me to go with him, as he had been told the stuff was of the most costly and exquisite of its kind. During our stay she chatted freely of her travels, her love of the arts, and all that, and I found myself unconciously fascinated as I never was before with the conversation of a woman. know I am a cynic in my judgment of the

"But she didn't tell you of her husband and castles and the rest?"

"Oh, no, that came from Drake. He met her in Paris, and it is through Mrs. Drake that she gained her entrance easily to the inner circle here. Drake and his wife were invited once to an evening in the salon of Madame Edmond Adam, and met her there, and that, of course, was a guarantee of her reputation, though I don't know why it should be.

"Reputation!" exclaimed Caxton indig-

hoping through him to secure an introduc-tion, but found that gentleman quarreling over politics with his successor who had de-feated him, and several others, all of the same party, but full of differences of opinion would have said, that meanwhile we should in private discussion. Mrs. Fardella was the center of a group of ladies who were evidently charmed by the remarkable person-ality which had in a moment caught the she were losing all thought of her sur-roundings; then she toyed with the keys as though waiting to know whether they would respond to what was passing in her taney. From that she drifted into an improvisation unlike anything ever heard before by any of that assembly Every human emotion and passion was por traved so clearly and thrillingly that the most stupid and unmusical ears caught the interpretation. All the phases of human life, the ease and luxury of the rich and the hunger and wailing of the poor, doubt and recklessness, purity and bestiality, love and hate, faith and infidelity, were recited as though from an open book. The peace and harmony of pastoral life mingled with the rush and roar of the city, and the stately and reverential measures of a grand mass were interrupted by the wildest of nac-chanalian revels. Then the player broke forth into the song of the toreador from

"Carmen," glided without a jar into the heart-broken strains of "Spirto Gentil," and ended with a Tyrolese air in the dialect of the natives which set everybody patting with their feet, and some of the younger people were irresistibly impelled to whirl through a mad waltz to the music of the The company were so impressed with the strange character of the performance that compliments were rather strained, and Mrs. Fardella, to these formal words, merely said that she could not play to her own satisfaction except for those whom she knew intimately.

"By heaven!" muttered young Caxton to himself, "I don't believe another creature exists who is equal to that, and yet anyone would know it was mere by-play, and scarcely a suggestion of her real power with the instrument and voice,"

"What a genius she is," exclaimed Secretary Hamilton "Or devil, which is about the same thing," said Eberle, whose cynical soul had not been so stirred in long years. "Drake, can't you tell us who and what she is?" asked the Secretary of the ex-Senator. "I don't believe anybody, even her most intimate friend can do that," answered Drake. "You might infer from her lovely, tawny complexion that she is Italian, but I was told in Paris that she is of American parentage, though born in Italy. Possibly the heat of Genoese suns gave her that gen-nine Italian flesh color when she was wont to run bareheaded among the Alps. When very young she was married to a wealthy Italian who was a sort of recluse and philosopber, and harbored social theories even more radical than those of Garibaldi and Cavour, which it is whisnered were fully absorbed by his beautiful wife. Since the death of her husband several years ago, Mrs. Fardella has passed most of her time in Paris, but makes strange and sudden excursions to all the great capitals, where she will appear as though by magic, set up a splendid estab-lishment in a night, move in a keenly obser vant way in the very best society of the court circle for a brief time, though apparently holding society in con-tempt, and then disappear without warning, as mysteriously as she came, to turn up in some other place in the same way. With all this strange life not a whisper has ever been heard against her reputation. The roues of the court circles are said to have choice spirits she surrounds herself with an impenetrable reserve. She is said to able to improvise and recite her poetry like woman ever did, to paint like a master and write and talk like a savant."

"A sort of 'She' in real life, as it were," interrupted Eberle.

"But you have seen her paintings, Eberle," said Caxton, "what did you think

"Well, they are remarkable-They are wonderfully broad and luminous and beautiful in tone, but she often sacrifices composition and mere beauty for realism. Her subjects are the last you would imagine as the choice of such a woman, being chiefly of the horrible, the reproduction of crime and misery with terrible truthfulness. But of course I had but a hasty view of them, and cannot speak con-

"I have heard," said Drake, resuming his story to end it, "that in St. Petersburg she came so near justifying the acts of the Nihilists as to be threatened with arrest, and that nothing saved her but her beauty and brilliancy, and the fact that women loved her as well as men. She flirted with nobody, sought to attract nobody, and so made no-body jealous. It is said the best women worship her wherever she goes."

"And one man at least could worship her now," thought young Caxton, as he sought the place where Mrs. Fardella had been, only to find that she had ordered her car riage and gone home.

It was but a little while, however, before Caxton gained the coveted introduction, and he at once proceeded to devote himself with all his arder to Mrs. Fardella. If there were others who had an ambition to be suitors they desisted when he showed by his at-tentions that he was badly hit; for no one would pretend to a fighting chance with the handsome, rich and accomplished young Southron as his antagonist. It was an oper field for a scion of one of the proudest and oldest families of the South, which was less hurt by the War of the Rebellion than most other families of distinction, and which had shown more pluck and cunning than most of them in repairing what was shattered. What astonished them who had been con vinced of the unimpressionable character of the woman was that Mrs. Fardella apparently encouraged the attentions of Cax-ton, with neither a suggestion of a flirtation nor yet of serious purpose, as though luring him to some point she had in view, and yet holding him aloof.

"It was in this room I first saw you," Caxton murmered to Mrs. Fardella one evening late in the season, and at the last formal reception at the house of Secretary Hamilton. "I am negotiating for the pur-Hamilton. chase of the place. I want it for that memory if for nothing more.' What a pity the Southern poetry and romance, of which your mind seems to be the outgrowth, should be so commingled with a history of brutal torture and wrongs so horrible that they cannot be named, said Mrs. Fardella. "Why do you always answer my kindliest sentiments with references to such unpleasant things?" "Reputation!" exclaimed Caxton indignantly, "I would stake my life that she is as pure as the purest of her sex."

"You know very well nobody would take the stakes if you lost," growled Eberle as the working people of the world are thrust."

Mrs. Hamilton and Mrs. Drake were of these admirers. Mrs. Drake was telling marry nor are given in marriage," rejoined how Mrs. Fardella had taken by storm this strange woman. With the exaggerated stories of her seat at the piano. After a moment of my career always traveling with me I do mental protest against the bad taste of not suppose I could have gained entrance forcing her to the front upon so short an ac-quaintance, Mrs. Fardella consented. For a little time she sat at the instrument and her eyes assumed a far-away look as though may be the subject of scandal and lies, and at the same time a welcome visitor, with no higher recommendation than a show of wealth, or official position or associations. By the way, you tell me you aim at public life; what do you intend to do when you get

"The first thing to do is to get there." said Caxton. "Suppose you were in the Senate now:

"One hundred years of your Senate has produced 1,000,000 men constantly lacking work by which to earn bread. That means 5,000,000 paupers. Will 100 years more, with a Senate composed of such ambitious gentlemen as yourself, produce 10,000,000 paupers?"

"If you had lived in France in '93 I could imagine you plotting along with Madame Hebert and Charlotte Corday." "And in France in another '93 I may be found plotting with greater women than either Hebert or Corday," said Mrs. Fardella in a low tone and with much em-

"Ah," said Caxton, "I am sure you were not made for that. Why, the thought is simply horrible. This is a day of growing humanity and liberty, and revolutions are accomplished by means of the ballot and ruling sentiment, and not by plotting and throat cutting.' "Will you revolutionize the prejudice against the negro in your Southern States by means of the ballot?" asked Mrs. Fardella with unconcealed irony.

"Oh, the negro question is a great problem," said Caxton with sudden coolness and reserve. "We have the speciacle of an intelligent white people overruled by the mere numbers of a people brutal, indolent, unprincipled, without moral sense, and by reason of insurmountable differences an in-ferior race now and for all time. The Southern white cannot and will not submit to any control from such creatures. After the war and so-called reconstruction we were timid for a time. We were defeated and dis-mantled. It was the sentiment of the victors that the former slave should now be the master by means of the ballot. We bowed for a while to that dictum. The time for submission is past, and every day the whites are weakening the power of the blacks. Soon, and the sooner the better for them and us, they will have no control in our State or national Government. We can rule better for them than they for themselves. They must be entirely disfranchised in fact if not in name." "In other words, you are about to repeat on a colossal scale an injustice to the negro as great as that which resulted in your ruin a quarter of a century ago, and after the ne-gro has been humanized and made ready and eager to fight for himself. Well, your punishment will assuredly and deservedly be a thousand fold greater than it was be-tore. The spirit of this time will admit of

Though I can say this calmly, my ambitions, my existence depends on your answer, for without you I shall simply live out my days an animated embodiment of death. I know there is no use of pleading. You have known what must of pleading. You have known what must come, and if you have not decided to accept, nothing that I can say will change such a mind as yours."

"I have expected this declaration," said Mrs. Fardella, quietly, "and decided to accept. But wait; save your expressions of atification till you have heard me through. You know nothing of me. It seems to me that one so proud of his family should in-quire carefully into the life and ancestry of the woman he would marry. Instead of that I fear you have permitted yourself to be enamored of my eccentricities, which some are pleased to call genius, and of my accomplishments, which consist merely of doing some things that other women do not do, and other things better than other women do, and none of them of real value to the world." none of them of real value to the world."

'I care nothing about your family or your life," exclaimed Caxton with much feeling.
"With ordinary women I would think much of that, but you overshadow every consideration of money, of family, even of reputation

"You fancy so now, but I cannot let you go farther in the dark. You know I was born of American parents. Well, my father was in the Senate of the United States before the war. After the outbreak of the war he sent my mother to Europe, followed us a little later, and there after a few months I was born at a country house near the village of Isola, on the northern slope of the Maritime Alps, not far from Genoa, and on the very estate which was afterward inherited by the gentleman who became my husband. Here is a miniature portrait of my father; perhaps you will recognize him. It is a beautiful picture and was painted from life by Finelli, of Rome, who at the same time, when my father visited us after the war, painted a companion portrait of my mother."

Caxton took the bit of ivory in his hands, ocked at it a moment, and exclaimed:
"Senator Vinton! why I knew him well when I was a boy. He was of my own State, and an intimate friend of my father.

A puzzled expression overspread Caxton's face, and when he looked inquiringly at Mrs. Fardella he saw something in her eyes that made him tremble with a terrible foreboding.

"But," he resumed hesitating, "pardon me, I have always heard that Senator Vinton's wife died childless."
"And she did," said Mrs. Fardella with perfect composure. "This is the portrait of my mother.

Caxton eagerly seized the second miniature. Looking at it his eyes dilated, his lower jaw dropped, he clutched at his hair with his right hand and gasped: "And—she—was—"

"A quadroon; my father's slave; my own mother, and one of the most beautiful wo-men that ever won the love of man. Finelli caught the tone of her flesh with wonderful My father worshiped her, and lavished upon her and me the tenderest care and the noblest love. You know he did not join in the war. He came to us and he and my mother died in Italy. The taint of the African and the ban of illegitimacy was upon me, but Signore Fardella was superio to such considerations and saw only the mind and the moral principle."

But Caxton heard not a word of this. Sitting a moment rigid as though struck to he staggered to his feet, shaking, clutching frantically at his throat, and then fell at length among the flowers of Secretary Hamilton's conservatory. There was a rush of guests around him, and many exclamations of alarm and inquiry.

"I fear Mr. Caxton has fainted," said

The Drygoods Market. The Drygoods Market.

New York, September 7.—The half holiday feeling was still in force in commission circles and business in drygoods at first hands was largely restricted to the orders received by mail, which, however, indicated a steady demand. The market was without new feature and the tone firm. The jobbing trade was alive, as on other days, closing one of the most active weeks on record, and business continued throughout the day. There is a buoyant feeling, heightened by the reports of similar activity in all parts of the country.

FIGHT WITH A BEAR. A Man and Dog Used Roughly Before the

Brute Was Killed. PEPECIAL TELEGRAM TO THE DISPATCH. KINGSTON, N. Y., September 8 .- Peter B. Markle had a desperate struggle with a bear near Samsonville, this county, this evening. His dog ran into the woods barking and Markle found he had treed a bear. It was about 20 feet from the ground. Markle fired at it and the bear fell to the no such outrage without full compensation."

"But for Heaven's sake, my dear madame, let us not drift into these questions. I have something to say to you of far more importance to me than a solution of social problems. Let me approach it as frankly as I can, for you are not the woman nor I the man for dramatic love-making. I need not tell you that I have surrendered to you all clothes were torn from his body.

A terrific battle then ensued between man, dog and bear. The bear had seized the dog as soon as it recovered from the shock of the fall to the ground, and the canine was soon howling with pain from his attention to Markle. His paws were quickly imbedded in the man's ficsh and his clothes were torn from his body. ground.

MARKETS BY WIRE. Weakness the Leading Feature of the Wheat Pit-The Downward Movement Continued-Public and Private Cables Decidedly Bearish - Pork Active and Unsettled.

CHICAGO-In the speculative branch of the wheat trade to-day there was a continuation of yesterday's weakness, prices showing further depreciation. News was in the main bearish, and so was local sentiment. The most import ant piece of news was a dispatch from Minne apolis saying that owing to the failure of all but four elevators in that city to comply with the new law and thus become regular, 1,000,000 bushels of wheat will disappear from the stocks there in the next report. Next in imhe Kansas Board of Agriculture estimating the crop of that State at 35,000,000 bushels, or 19,000,000 bushels in excess of the yield of 1888.

selling orders from the Northwest were received. Receiving houses here are getting orders to sell Kansas No. 3 red wheat in 50,000 bushel sell Kansas No. 3 red wheat in 50,000 bushel lots to arrive. There was pretty large trade in the pit for a Saturday. Temporary strength was developed early by the covering of two or three large lines of shorts, but the undertone was weak and the bears were in control most of the session. The net decline for the leading futures was $260 c, and the closing figures were within a small fraction of the bottom for the day and week. There was general liquidation by discouraged longs, and some selling for account of Eastern parties. Both public and private cables noted dull and easier markets. A moderate speculative trade was transacted in corn, and the feeling developed was weaker on September, while the other futures showed but little change compared with yesterday's closing figures. About the only feature was the free selling of September by a prominent local trader, which reduced the premium of that future so that now it is quotable about the same as October.

that future so that now it is quotable about the same as October.

Trading in oats was fair for May, but for other months very little business transpired. There was liberal buying orders for May at the inside and fair offerings at the outside figures, and the market held steady at a slight decline. Considerable interest was manifested in mess pork, and speculative trading was quite active and almost exclusively in October and January deliveries. The feeling was somewhat unsettled and prices irregular, the former ruling 8e higher and the latter 7½@10e lower. The market closed at about outside figures for the former and inside for the latter.

A comparatively light business was reported in lard, and the feeling was steady. Sales were made at about yesterday's range of prices.

In short rib sides a moderately active trade

In short rib sides a moderately active trade was reported, and the market was steadier. Prices ruled somewhat irregular and averaged higher.
